

Please refrain from weakening Indiana's telephone privacy law. The quality of life without telemarketers calling 6-8 times a day, not counting when no one is home, is much improved. When the telephone rings, I know it's someone calling for a real reason, and not some idiot trying to sell me premium vinyl siding.

When I'm sleeping in and the phone rings, I know it's something important, and not yet another insurance salesman.

I used to work the night shift, and telemarketers were the bane of my existence. I had to leave the telephone on in case of emergencies at work, but instead I'd get telemarketers calling every hour or so. I don't think I ever managed a straight 6 hours of sleep without the interruption. The Indiana law changes that for everyone.

Don't screw over the people of Indiana. They wouldn't do it to you.
